BENVENUTO CELLINI

Sculptor, Goldsmith, Writer

EDITED BY

MARGARET A. GALLUCCI

PAOLO L. ROSSI

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
CONTENTS

List of Illustrations  ix
List of Contributors xii
Acknowledgments xv
Color Plates xvii

INTRODUCTION 1
Margaret A. Gallucci and Paolo L. Rossi

PART I: COMPETITION, CREATIVITY, AND COURT CULTURE

1 Cellini, Michelangelo, and the Myth of Inimitability 7
   Jane Tylus

2 Drawing the Line
   Benvenuto Cellini’s On the Principles and Method of Learning the Art of Drawing and the Question of Amateur Drawing Education 26
   Patricia L. Reilly

PART II: CELLINI AS ARTISAN, ARTIST, AND AUTHOR

3 University, Professionalism, and the Workshop
   Cellini in Florence, 1545–1562 53
   Michael Cole
CONTENTS

4 Cellini’s Saliera
   The Salt of the Earth at the Table of the King  71
   Marina Belozerskaya

5 Cellini’s Coins and Medals  97
   Philip Attwood

PART III: ARTISTIC PRODUCTION,
GENDER, AND LITERARY PRACTICE

6 Cellini as Iconographer  123
   Gwendolyn Trottein

7 Cellini’s Bust of Cosimo I and Vita
   Parallels Between Renaissance Artistic and Literary Portraiture  148
   Victoria C. Gardner Coates

PART IV: THE HISTORY AND RECEPTION
OF CELLINI’S TRATTATI

8 “Par rem uno, e pur saremo dua”
   The Genesis and Fate of Benvenuto Cellini’s Trattati  171
   Paolo L. Rossi

PART V: METAMORPHOSIS INTO THE ARTIST AS MODERN HERO

9 Benvenuto Cellini as Pop Icon  201
   Margaret A. Gallucci

Select Bibliography  223
Index  237
ILLUSTRATIONS

COLOR PLATES

VII Cellini, Clement VII, reverse of a struck silver medal showing Moses striking the rock. London, British Museum. © Copyright The British Museum.

ILLUSTRATIONS

FIGURES

1  Frontispiece from Goethe, Goethe's Werke Vol. 16: Leben des Benvenuto Cellini. 52
2  Cellini, Saltcellar, view with the saltcellar. 72
3  Cellini, Saltcellar, view with the pepper pot. 73
4  Saltcellar, mid-13th century, French, Paris. 79
5  January page of the Très Riches Heures of the Duc de Berry (ca. 1413–16). 82
6  January page of the Grimani Breviary (ca. 1510). 83
7  Cellini, Saltcellar, view with Hercules. 91
8  Cellini, Clement VII, struck silver medal. 99
9  Reverse of a silver denarius of Trajan (a.d. 98–117). 101
10 Reverse of a copper as of Nero (a.d. 54–68). 101
11 Cellini, Clement VII, reverse of a struck silver medal. 105
12 Cellini, Francis I, electrotype of a cast version of a struck medal. 108
14 Cellini, reverse of a gold scudo of Paul III. 112
15 Cellini, reverse of a silver half-giulio of Alessandro de’ Medici. 113
16 Cellini, silver forty-soldi of Alessandro de’ Medici. 115
17 Cellini, Horseman Overcoming Fortune, reverse of bronze medal for Francis I (1537 or 1538). 129
18 Workshop of Baccio Baldini? The Planet Mars and His “Children,” Florentine engraving, ca. 1460. 131
19 Workshop of Baccio Baldini? The Planet Venus and Her “Children,” Florentine engraving, ca. 1460. 133
20 Raphael, An Allegory (‘Vision of a Knight’), egg tempera on poplar, ca. 1504. 134
21 Peter Vischer the Younger, Virtue and Voluptas, pen drawing. 135
ILLUSTRATIONS

22 Workshop of Baccio Baldini? The Planet Mercury and His “Children,” Florentine engraving, ca. 1460. 139
23 Cellini, detail of Perseus showing Perseus’ helmet from the back with the Janus mask. 142
24 Cellini, detail of Perseus showing Minerva’s shield and Medusa’s decapitated body. 143
25 Cellini. Perseus Rescuing Andromeda, bronze relief from the base of the Perseus statue. 145
26 Cellini, Medal of Pope Clement VII. 149
27 Baccio Bandinelli, Bust of Cosimo I. 153
28 Bust of Emperor Hadrian, Roman, second century C.E. 155
29 Title page of 1568 edition of the Trattati published in Florence by Valente Panizza and Marco Peri. 177
30 Title page of the 1731 edition of the Trattati published in Florence by Gaetano Tartini and Santi Franchi. 178
31 Title page of the editio princeps of the Vita usually dated 1728 but published in Naples in 1730. 179
32 Title page of the counterfeit edition of the editio princeps of the Vita published in Florence by Bartolini in 1787. 180
33 Title page of the Milanesi edition of 1857, which printed the full Marciana text of the Trattati for the first time. 181
34 The Affairs of Cellini (1934). 203
35 Joseph Schildkraut, as Benvenuto Cellini, in The Firebrand. 205
36 Playbill cover of Cellini by John Patrick Shanley (2001). 217
INTRODUCTION

Margaret A. Gallucci and Paolo L. Rossi

Benvenuto Cellini, the first anthology in English on the great Italian Renaissance artist and autobiographer Benvenuto Cellini (1500–71), offers new perspectives on the artist and his place in Renaissance art, literature, and culture, as well as his legacy in European publishing history and modern American pop culture. The essays in this volume approach the multifaceted career of Cellini from a multidisciplinary perspective, cutting across boundaries, as did the artist himself. We have brought together for the first time scholars from a wide range of disciplines who utilize a variety of critical approaches in interpreting Cellini’s life and works. Our richly illustrated volume, containing new photography of the artist’s spectacular Saltcellar, commissioned by French King Francis I and housed in the Kunsthistorisches Museum in Vienna, offers new insights into the life, works, and legacy of this major figure of the Renaissance.

Our book consists of nine essays in five parts. To avoid undermining the interdisciplinary nature of the project by separating Cellini’s art from his writings, and thus images from texts, we have arranged the articles by medium and milieu. Part I, “Competition, Creativity, and Court Culture,” picks up the theme of Cellini the artist and traces his strategies of power and patronage in his relations with patrons and rival artists, particularly at the Medici court. It explores how his very different activities reflected not only his need to be flexible, in the light of changing requests from his patrons, but also the evolution of his own self-awareness as a unique creative talent. Jane Tylus analyzes the production of a language of inimitability in the writings of both Michelangelo and Cellini, suggesting that Cellini was central in creating a new system of generating aesthetic value in late Renaissance Italy. Patricia Reilly shows how, after the death of Michelangelo in 1564, Cellini and two of his contemporary artists, Alessandro Allori and Vincenzo Danti, set out to elevate the status of their art by codifying in treatise form Michelangelo’s principles of constructing the anatomically correct human form. They did so, she argues, to gain admission to the prestigious literary institution, the Academia Fiorentina.
INTRODUCTION

The next section focuses on goldsmithing and jewellery at the courts of the papacy in Rome and of King Francis I in Paris and sculpture at the Medici court in Florence. Part II, “Cellini as Artisan, Artist, and Author,” therefore sheds light on Cellini’s career, his training, the importance and manufacture of small precious objects, as well as large-scale projects, and on his writings. Michael Cole considers Cellini’s sculptural career in Florence, presenting a sociology of the bronze caster that attempts to pin down for the first time the reasons for the artist’s failure to become Florence’s premier bronzist. The second essay in this section assesses the design and function of the Saltcellar (Belozerskaya) and analyzes his coins and medals (Attwood). Marina Belozerskaya analyzes the role of the saliera as bearer and framer — symbolically, gustatorially, and economically — of salt and pepper as well as an exposition of Francis I’s domestic and international policies. Philip Attwood places Cellini’s neglected coins and medals into a multivalent context of contemporary tastes and practices that argues for a renewed appreciation of Cellini’s skill in producing strikingly original and beautiful designs. Part II examines the commissions in bronze and marble that he executed for Duke Cosimo I de’ Medici and traces the import of these works, both for his career and for the development of his working practice. All of these topics are extensively treated by Cellini in both his Vita and his Treatises on Goldsmithing and Sculpture.
INTRODUCTION

Part III, “Artistic Production, Gender, and Literary Practice,” contains two essays that use gender theory to link Cellini’s artistic production to his writings and to explore the complex iconography embedded in the works the artist executed for Cosimo I. Gwendolyn Trottein argues that Cellini’s “icons,” whether sculpted with words or wax, defy “graphy,” keeping at bay the unavoidably reductive nature of writing, while nonetheless appropriating classical and topical content. Victoria Gardner Coates suggests that Cellini’s art and writings reveal a consistent approach to portraiture based on the actual features of the subject that the artist then heroicizes through the process of imitazione, designed to associate the portraits with a series of canonical models.

Having established the world of Cellini’s prose, Part IV, “The History and Reception of Cellini’s Trattati,” concentrates on the tortured history of his literary production. The essay that comprises this part nails down, for the first time, the exact circumstances and personalities involved not only in the writing of the Trattati but also in the tangled history of their publication. Paolo Rossi analyzes the literary strategies and aspirations employed by Cellini when he realized that, by the mid-1560s, his career as an artist was over. For Rossi, the two versions of the Trattati were aimed at securing a position within the context of the Medici fascination with experimentation and investigation of the natural world. Rossi offers a fascinating account of the editio princeps of the Trattati and of the historical circumstances of the text’s publication, reception, and subsequent fortune prior to the twentieth century.

The concluding Part V, serving as Epilogue, “Metamorphosis Into the Artist as Modern Hero,” brings Cellini into the twentieth century by exploring the enduring popularity of the artist in the twentieth-century American imagination. Margaret Gallucci’s article complements the essay by Rossi by considering the critical fortune of Cellini, the man and myth, in modern and postmodern American popular culture just as Part IV discusses the critical fortune of one of the artist’s primary texts. Her essay examines Cellini’s lasting fascination, both as an artist and as a lionized symbol of that much applauded fiction, the “Renaissance Man.”
INTRODUCTION

We would like to advise the reader that the Select Bibliography lists only secondary and not primary sources. For primary sources, please refer to the notes to the individual essay.